Gender-based violence against women is a widespread phenomenon that does not differ based on social or economic status, cultural background, ethnicity, and religion. Epidemiological data in industrialized countries show that in the age group 16-70 about 31% of women report having experienced some form of violence (physical, sexual, psychological, stalking/persecution, economic). Violence, frequently perpetrated and repeated by an intimate partner of the woman, results in a serious impact on the physical and psychological health and is reflected on children, especially younger ones, who are often direct victims or witnesses of violence. This phenomenon can be most effectively countered through a multi-professional "network", engaging the institutions as well, addressing the relevant health, psychological, social, legal, and juridical aspects in a coordinated manner.

"NETWORK FOR WOMEN"

AUSL of Romagna sets in place procedures to provide guidance to health care personnel, particularly in Emergency Rooms, receiving and taking care of women and minors who are experiencing violence; mentoring programs are also offered to men willing to change and to prevent repeated violence.
